This book brings together the main ideas of introductory algebra. They grew out of lectures given at the university to junior students of mathematics and is designed for a one or two- semester course in algebra and presumes some prior knowledge of mathematics at the pre-university level. The authors' goal is to present the subject of algebra from its basic foundation of logic that leads to the study of the real and complex number systems and subsequently sequences and series in the real number system. Since the evolution of algebra from its beginning is closely linked with problems of finding solutions to polynomial equations, this subject is introduced and discussed in Chapter 6 of the book. The subsequent topics of linear equations and matrices in Chapter 7 and vectors in Chapter 8 are consequent to the discussion of polynomials in the earlier chapter.

This book summarizes significant studies on soil properties of selected forest reserves and cultivated lands around Malaysia. The research on forest soils covered in these studies are largely on the forest reserves of Chikus, Tapah Hill and Kinta forest in Perak,

Malaysia. Some soil properties evaluation was also carried out in different land usage areas in Bintulu, Sarawak. The last chapter is on research about using valuable tropical forest trees to remediate contaminated forest soil through phytoremediation. The book comprises of extensive information on the interpretation of results of soil analyses; the interpretation is done in a simple and easy to understand manner. This book is ideal for any student, researcher or member of the public that wants to know more about the nature of forest soils.

Tropical Tree for Urban Environment: Their Microclimatic Properties

Trees have always been a major element in urban landscape design. Formerly, the existence of trees in landscape design focused on the aesthetic and functional aspects of trees in offering better urban living environments. By understanding the thermal performances of these tropical trees, they can be appropriately used in planting design and the suitable implementation of tree planting scheme could be achieved. The combination of trees' technical and physiology aspects in this handbook will guide designers in achieving environmental design quality by focusing on climate adaptation and microclimate improvement through the right choice of landscape trees. Given the environmental contributions of trees to the environment especially towards human thermal comfort in tropical climate, knowledge that contribute to the proper selection of trees species for thermal performances is essential for landscape architects, architects and other related urban professionals as well as to interested urban residents.
